"Mice and Men" is a most agreeable picture. Its story is a bit too simple for a film. Following the play, the picture tells how Mark Embury, a well-to-do bachelor, adopts an orphan with the idea of training her as an ideal wife for himself, only to lose her at last to his young nephew.

Miss Clark is well cast. Of course, the is pretty, but beyond and above that she has at her command a number of those small tricks of expression which enliven the art of moving picture acting. Marshall Neilan as Captain Lovell is the best member of the supporting company.

We wonder if those folk who think that moving pictures are no good would fail to avoid the series of automobile and the series of a breeze which bit where she runs across a shaded lawn in the face of a breeze which billows her hoopskirt.

The career of the proprietor of "The Daily Telegraph" was one of hard work, and steady advancement from a small beginning. After an academic schooling at the University College school in London, where he won several prizes, he was given the choice between entering London University or joining his father in business. He selected the latter pursuit. His father was head of a printing firm, and in 1855 had acquired a small newspaper, "The Daily Telegraph and Courier." Young Levy was given charge of this property and spent his life in developing it into a great newspaper. In that year the paper was reduced from two pence to a penny (two cents) and was the first In the benefit of foreign artach as was given last winter, and as was given last winter in C.
